Buildup to Black Friday this week With Black Friday fever hitting shoppers across the country today's sales stories and offers are looking a little more appealing for students. Yale University's Angely Minahan is one student who will be up at the crack of dawn this week to grab a bargain. She thinks there are a lot of ways of saving money this year. "If you look at the lowest prices, you really have to look in the $100 range and most probably you have to wait until the weekend for it, but just regular discounts you can get on things like textbooks, especially in early, late period," she said. Minahan says it can be a good chance to see what a certain university or country has to offer. "I just know that Yale has some really good textbooks so I don't know if I want to buy it here or I want to bring it in from home," she said. A lot of students like Minahan plan on shopping online. However, the online industry is forecasted to lose $3.8 billion dollars this year. With sales like this, not all shoppers will be having a positive experience. Sceptics like Hannah and Mather have been making purchases at malls in the hopes of finding bargains. Hannah says she went to a shopping center not far from her hometown in order to find a range of clothes, handbags and shoes. "I'm a little bit skeptical about
