The present invention pertains to the field of knee protectors and more particularly to apparatus which is attachable to a user's leg for movement thereof to press a tape against an exposed portion of the user's leg to protect the leg against injuries. Many types of shoes, particularly athletic shoes, have adhesives applied to the sole of the shoe. These adhesives are used to affix an outsole member to the shoe, particularly for traction. It is sometimes difficult to glue shoes together and this is particularly a problem when the adhesive is applied to the sole of the shoe as part of the manufacturing process. In this event, the shoes become glued together and the adhesive is only partially harden by the time they reach the user. It is common for the user to wear shoes which are not glued together and for the user to walk about with parts of the shoes sticking to or sticking to other parts of the shoes. When this occurs, the user's legs are exposed to injury and often the injury is to the knee. There have been several attempts to protect the user's knee, and more particularly the knee joint, but these have not proved to be entirely satisfactory. U.S. Pat. No. 3,583,133 to Charles A. Milsap discloses a knee protector comprised of a pad of resilient material to be 0cc13bf012
