In this article, you can also find some videos featuring FIFA developers talking about the game in general and how they built the game's gameplay from scratch. Click to view full gallery... The HyperMotion Technology is based on a similar system used in the 2014 FIFA World Cup Brazil game. For example, a defender sprints towards the ball (run), makes an aerial challenge (tackle) and then makes a challenge on the ball while on the ground (tackle). It means that the AI team also makes a run, makes a tackle and makes a tackle while on the ground. The HyperMotion technology powers the game's flagship feature: The Tactical Free Kick! Tactical Free Kick Tactical free kicks are used to test the AI's reaction to the situation and are often used to test how well the AI can read your intentions. You see in the following video the way the AI uses the Tactical Free Kick. In the above video, the AI has two options when facing down in the penalty box: Take a shot: The AI will either shoot with his left foot (when facing right) or with his right foot (when facing left), depending on the direction he is in. Take a pass: The AI will either pass to an AI defender or to an available attacker. Tactical Free Kick in Practice Mode The Tactical Free Kick feature is also available in Practice Mode. When you choose the Tactical Free Kick option, the AI will use its best positioning to test your understanding of the tactical situation. For example, when the AI, facing down in the penalty box, takes a shot, it will use the following way of positioning itself: In the above video, the player is facing down in the penalty box and, when he shoots, the AI will run towards his right (left foot if the player is facing right). When the AI takes a pass, the player will be farther to the left. When the AI tries to pass to an attacker or a defender, he will be closer to the goal. How the AI uses the Tactical Free Kick in Practice Mode On the left, the AI is facing the goal and trying to score. The AI is waiting for you to take a shot: While the player is facing towards the goal, the AI is running towards the goal. The player kicks the
