Corpoct is a fictional mega-corporation which is similar to the real-life Monopolies and Goliaths of the world. THe corporation's goal is to extract all the valuable resources in the galaxy and make a profit out of it. Naturally, they have the worst reputation in deep space. Rival corporations are either too weak to stop Corpoct or they are Corpoct's pawns. Corpoct's best efforts to expand their territory have made them the richest corporation of the galaxy. They have grown into a monster but their number of workers is far lower than they need to increase their already huge profit. When a disruptive event causes them to fail, all their work is done. The whole giant ship is left in a random position in the galaxy. When a spaceship or item falls off of the ship, it starts an adventure with your commander and three mappers. Developer's Notes I'm sorry for the delayed update. I had to move away from the forums because of the ill will and unpleasantries from my former fans. I miss the idea of free discussion. It sucks that the jig is up. I hate that.But I have to. I wish I could figure a way to make comments on this or my other projects without being called a hypocrite. But this was necessary. New opportunities require new thoughts. I have a lot of plans. But no time to put them in words right now. I guess this will be the last time I post in this forum.  Orion on the disk. If you've been anticipating the arrival of a new OrvoR product line for a while now, you might be a little disappointed with today's release announcement. It seems Golly's development has stopped, and all of the major assets associated with the project have been removed. In an effort to explain what's going on, Golly's site has been completely overhauled, and some of the old content was moved to a new wiki, which can be found here. If you have any further questions, make your queries on the new Golly's forums. This is a very big bummer for the RPG community, so let's hope we can get to the bottom of what's going on with the studio, and perhaps get another OrvoR game released on a frequent basis once the staff decides it's time to continue development. I have a class A that has a method Start. in class A i have a method Start. public void Start(MyM:Method) { //deal with MyM } now in another class i want to call the method Start but i want to do that for several MyM, so i dont want to define it in class A. so i do this: class B:A { private void MyM() { //do something } public void Start(MyM:Method) { //look which method is called } } and i want to do this: B b = new B(); b.Start(MyM:name); but i dont know how to detect the MyM given name. A: Not as far as you are getting. The MethodInfo is stored on the Method object, not the instance (unless it is a generic type). Or it could be stored internally at the IL level, but you are now getting into the realm of the asm decompiler. Your options are: use Activator.CreateInstance(type) and use the MethodInfo as appropriate c9d1549cdd

 -A Gold Rush Story by Pirates of Fiction LAST PIRATE ADVENTURE: CAPTAIN DRAPER'S TREASURE by Allan von Mueckenham If you ever needed proof that pirates have been running about in the middle of history for as long as our species has been around, pirates of yore are beating it out of Barcelona in 1492 with a nation of kids arguing whether to play football or play computer games next. As we venture into the future, we have been plunged into the past. And, for this story, we venture back just about as far as you can go... "What do we do first, Skipper?" Uhfetchuk yelled into the voice-activated mike of her mnemoticray. Meem fingered the toggle switch on the back of her headrest and listened to the voice of her commander. "How about an eco-check?" he answered, "To make sure we haven't triggered any surface-to-space transmissions." "Negative," Meem said, "as our shield is fully operational. What was your guy's name?" "Vira," Uhfetchuk answered, "Baba Vira, extinct for thirty-two years now, and who the salacious petal-patted heck would want to resurrect him?" "You sounded positively Evelyn-de-Sadeish," Meem said, "I thought you were joking at first." "I have a close personal relationship with the dear departed," Uhfetchuk answered, "and I respect the sanctity of his memory. Besides, we've already plumbed every nook and cranny of the whole area. There's nothing else to do here." "A depressing truth," Meem agreed, "at least, until we launch." "Try to be more sympathetic," Uhfetchuk cautioned, "we are testing a new technique, one of their air pods," she explained, "so anything could happen." "Oh!" Meem said, "But what if they shoot us down?" "That's what your shield is supposed to protect against," Uhfetchuk explained, "it's not rocket science. It's not very likely, though, trust me." Meem sighed, "I don't, darling. I would no more trust your rocket science than I would trust your navigational skills in the
