Devices such as printers and plotters that use electrostatic charging devices, for example an electrophotographic process such as the Xerox® 4600, are well known. In such devices, a photosensitive dielectric drum is uniformly charged with electrostatic charge, usually with a corona device. A laser beam scans across the drum to form a latent electrostatic image on the drum. The image is developed by contacting the drum with toner to create a visible image that is transferred to a sheet of paper. The paper is then passed through a fuser to fix the image to the paper. However, the corona devices are not without their problems, such as the ozone and volatile organic compounds (VOC) they emit. Recent environmental regulations have further added to the problems inherent to corona chargers. In particular, recently published US government regulations as set forth in the Clean Air Act of 1990 have imposed new requirements for VOC emission. One solution to reduce or eliminate corona devices, the ozone and VOC emissions associated with them, is to use triboelectric charging devices. These devices rely on friction to provide the initial electrostatic charging, rather than ionization of ambient air. This mode of operation is particularly advantageous in view of recent environmental regulations regarding ozone and VOC emissions. U.S. Pat. No. 5,455,115, issued to Johnson, et al, entitled "Electrostatic Toner Apparatus And Method", on Oct. 3, 1995, shows a corona-free, and hence VOC-free, process. The process is to transfer the charge to a dielectric member by means of a roller, such as a dielectric coated drum. The drum is then charged by a conventional electrostatic charging device. One drawback of the method shown in Johnson, et al, is that the roller must be specially coated to permit triboelectric charging. If a roller having a non-triboelectric surface were used in place of the charged drum, the process described in Johnson, et al would result in a significant drop in the voltage
