The workshop, led by partners from the Atomic Energy Education Program and the National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA), was held at the Plattsburgh State Laboratory of Conservation and Chemistry. Participants received hands-on exercises and discussions about the importance of quality assurance at nuclear facilities. "Attending the seminar last week was a valuable experience for the workshop participants," said Susan Frenette, education program manager for the Atomic Energy Education Program at the Idaho National Laboratory (INL). "We were pleased to provide materials for them to use to make their training sessions more efficient and effective." The seminar aims to help participants gain a fundamental understanding of quality assurance at nuclear facilities and how it helps protect the safety and security of the nation. For example, examples of quality assurance at nuclear facilities can include providing information about the purpose of a facility, what it will accomplish, and any unique safety and security challenges it may face. The workshop was an opportunity for students to share information and experience on quality assurance with their peers and to see for themselves how quality assurance at nuclear facilities works. "We also hoped to use the seminar to introduce a large number of students to the field of nuclear science and radiation science," said Bill McMurray, a senior lecturer at INL who heads the seminar planning committee. "We very much appreciate the opportunity to work with the NNSA to bring this workshop to the public." The seminar is part of a larger program known as the Research and Education Program in Nuclear Safeguards (REPS). REPS is administered by the NNSA's Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory (INEEL) on behalf of the United States Department of Energy (DOE) and its national laboratories. The seminar was co-sponsored by the INL, the New York Office of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation, the New York State Department of Health, and the New York Department of State Division of Criminal Justice Services. Many of the workshop attendees left with a better understanding of quality assurance and nuclear science,
