Duplicate Cleaner Pro 4.1.4 Crack Free Download [2020] MasterKeyQ: How does Android device know an instance of a service has been stopped? I'm working on an Android app that lets users create an instance of a service. The service then periodically posts a status back to the activity that created the instance. When the user closes the activity that created the instance, I want to stop the service and then restart it when the user wants to create a new instance. I'm having a little trouble figuring out how the device knows when the instance of the service has been closed. My solution was to have the activity call onDestroy() and have the service call onDestroy() after it has finished its work. My hunch is that the activity didn't finish and that's why the device is still sending the activity the "its stopped" status. Is that correct? How do I figure this out? A: The activity lifecycle is asynchronous, so when the activity is going down and the activity onDestroy method is called, the activity still exists. The fact that it hasn't finished its onDestroy method isn't relevant in this case. /* * Copyright (c) 2010-2019 Belledonne Communications SARL. * * This file is part of Liblinphone. * * This program is free software: you can redistribute it and/or 6d1f23a050
